ABSTRACT

The South African Information Exchange (SAIE) has published an update of 35 existing organizations who are engaged in funding initiatives for specific areas of South African and United States educational exchange programs. One list is alphabetical by such program categories as: academic exchange, academic support, adult education, advocacy, agriculture, alternative education, bridging education, bursaries (internal), business development, church leadership development, community development, conflict resolution, curriculum development, detainee assistance, distance education, emergency relief, employment, English as a Second Language, faculty fellowships, family planning, health, housing, human rights, leadership development, legal education/representation, literacy, management, materials development, numeracy, nutrition, outreach programs, political action, publications, race relations, refugee education/assistance research, rural education, scholarships (external), secondary schools, and technical/vocational training. The second list provides name, address, phone number, contact person, and other comments of the institutions responding to the survey. (GLR)

U.S. FOUNDATION FUNDING FOR CHANGE IN SOUTH AFRICA: An Update

Introduction

In 1987, the Institute of International Education's South African Information Exchange (SAIE) published the first in its working paper series--U.S. Foundation Giving to Enhance Educational Opportunities for Black South Africans. The objective of the publication was two-fold: to analyze the (then) present state of funding of South Africa-related activities, including observations on legal considerations on such grantmaking, and to provide an inventory of specific, up-to-date information on South Africa-related policies and grants of individual foundations. It was, to our knowledge, the first time such information had been presented.

In 1988, the Investor Responsibility Research Centre contributed to the literature by issuing American Philanthropy: A Guide for South Africans, whose stated purpose was "to inform the debate among South Africans about the political connotations of American public and private development funds, and also to offer a practical guide for South African community development organizations seeking funds in the United States."

Building on that initiative, the Council on Foundations established in 1989 the Southern Africa Grantmakers' Affinity Group, whose objectives are "to facilitate communication and increased cooperation in grantmaking among Southern African grantmakers and to nurture increased private American grantmaking in the region."

Continuing to act on its mandate to produce South Africa-related information for both support-seeking and support-granting organizations, the SAIE has published eight working papers in addition to the early one on U.S. foundations. Four of these survey the South Africa-related initiatives of U.S. professional associations, U.S. colleges and universities, U.S. corporations, and U.S. churches. The other four are guides to U.S.-related corporate trusts in South Africa; to U.S. support organizations raising money for South African causes; to sources for tertiary-level bursaries within South Africa; and to organizations providing assistance to South African exiles and refugees.

Two other working papers are being published simultaneously with this one--an update of U.S. college and university initiatives for change in South Africa and an anthology of SAIE-sponsored Discussion Forum presentations from 1987-1989. (Titles and reference numbers for the entire series are listed on the back cover.) There are other topics now in progress--for example, foreign embassy funding mechanisms within South Africa and nonformal, nongovernmental, nonprofit skills training available to the community within South Africa.

These working papers share certain characteristics. They are, at the time of their publication, unique. They are hole-punched for a binder and readily reproducible. They attempt to democratize information by widely and quickly disseminating little-known information about South Africa-related resources.

The reaction--from South Africa, from Europe, from the United States--to the SAIE's services has been extremely positive. The need to know about existing and potential resources remains critical. We have frequently been asked when we would update the first working paper on U.S. foundations--arguably one of the most important donor constituencies.

This document is that update. In November 1989, we printed out from our database a list of 156 private foundations (and corporate foundations) that had regularly received our publications. We had entered their names into our database (and onto our mailing list) from a variety of sources--participants' lists from South Africa-related conferences, for example, or from reading their annual reports.

We wrote a personal letter to each of them, enclosing a check-list of 40 or so areas of program initiative (e.g., health, housing, human rights, research, nonracial education) and inviting them to fill out and return the check-list. In addition to the specific program areas, we provided a space for "other," since we knew our check-list was not all-inclusive.

By April 1, 1990, we had received responses from 35 organizations that had filled out and returned the check-list, resulting in a list of 316 program initiatives. Another 40 organizations replied, requesting for a variety of reasons that we not list their names in a directory. We did not hear from the remaining 81 organizations.

The final information consists of a print-out, alphabetically, by area of program initiative and one by institution, with "other" comments included under the organization's name. We offer this working paper at a crucial time in South Africa's history, with the hope that it will stimulate further and more innovative relationships among organizations--assistance agencies and implementing agencies--working for change.
